

Worker Wellbeing in a Changing Labor Market (Research in Labor Economics)

How do workers fare in a continually changing labor market? This volume contains fifteen original scientific papers each examining how socio-economic changes affect worker wellbeing. Among the findings are: (1) Most increases in female labor force participation occur among women with high husbands earnings, dispelling the myth that shrinking husbands relative earnings cause womens work activities to rise. (2) Increased globalization equalizes pay between but expands pay within corporate establishments. (3) High quality colleges widen the earnings distribution for top earners but only negligibly affect earnings for low wage earners. (4) Mathematical success depends on school quality more so than verbal learning. (5) Adult daughters who visit ailing parents daily in a nursing home decrease their annual labor supply by about 1,000 hours implying a welfare loss of 180,000 dollars. (6) Physical and/or sexual abuse appear to afflict over 30% of the population leading to a 15% drop in employment probability and a 32% loss in wages. (7) Training workers in an entirely new occupation raises an employees wage growth while training workers in the same occupation decreases their wage growth, at least during the Russian economy's recent transition.
