

Poetry for Everyone

The topics of poetry are unlimited. In this volume I touch on the topics of nature, love, life, humor, children, religion, and aging, roughly in that order, plus a serving of poems in the haiku style. There is no line of development that runs through these poems, so feel free to jump around to whichever title catches your eye. Speaking of jumping around, there is an interactive table of contents, so point to a title in the table of contents, click, and the computer will take you immediately to that poem! One of the universal attributes of poetry is succinctness. Poetry tries to capture or evoke an important, interesting, or funny point or image or emotion in as few words as possible. It is this evocative economy of words that gives poetry its punch and enables us to remember it; indeed, its economy of words even causes us to want to remember it. A good novel causes us to remember its plot and characters. A good poem causes us to remember it. Another of poetry's attributes, perhaps its most well-known, is its use of rhyme and alliteration or tonal cohesion. With or without explicit rhyme a good poem has a kind of felt verbal cohesion that makes us want to say it out loud and roll it around in our mouths and minds. I hope that some of these poems bring a chuckle, touch your heart, punch you in the gut, or turn on a light that causes you to feel more keenly something familiar, or causes you to see something new or in a new way. But I will be most gratified if my efforts to express my own thoughts and feelings poetically motivate you to express some of your own thoughts and feelings poetically. Bon voyage.
