In both kingdoms, they formed the only party who, at this time, entertained correct views of constitutional liberty; and though they have been grossly maligned, even their bitterest enemies have been forced to acknowledge, that whatever measure of freedom the empire now enjoys, is in a great measure to be attributed to their generous and disinterested patriotism. In Ireland they were numerous, and were to be found among the members of both houses of parliament; and in Ulster, though many had abandoned the country and retired to Scotland, they still constituted the predominant party. The overbearing power of Strafford had depressed them for a time. But, emancipated from this restraint, and encouraged by their brethren in England and their countrymen in Scotland, they now manifested a determination to seek a thorough redress of the grievances under which the country had been groaning. In this determination they were at first joined by the Roman Catholic party--a singular coalition, which did not exist in either of the sister kingdoms. But, in Ireland both Presbyterian and Papist had equally felt the severities of Straffords administration; both were equally indignant at the usurpations of the bishops and the ecclesiastical courts; and both could unite, to a certain length, in resisting and removing these oppressions. But as the one party sought only reformation of the Church, while the other aimed at effecting its overthrow, and, with it, the demolition of Protestantism, the period soon arrived when they could no longer co-operate. In the meantime, while united, they constituted a formidable party; and, even in the second session, their influence proved predominant in both houses of parliament. They reduced the subsidies which...
