Not illustrated.1902 Excerpt: ... CHAPTER VII. SLAVERY, 1846--1866. Long before 1848 the subject of slavery had become involved in the mesh of politics. In the presidential campaign of 1844 party spirit ran high in both the North and the South. Another election was now at hand, and the contending parties were preparing for battle. The Presbyterian Church had never pretended to direct political thought; it contented itself with working on the heart and conscience, and thus impelling the individual to accept the precepts of the Bible as the rule and guide of his conduct in civil affairs. From this vantage ground it could teach that which was right and descry that which was wrong without mentioning particular instances, especially those which might be within the domain of party politics. The Springfield Church, as a part of the Church at large, steadfastly adhered to the principle of noninterference in civil affairs. A large part of the congregation, nevertheless, believed that so far as slavery was concerned silence was equivalent to acquiescence, and, if the Church refused its support in a cause so humane and so just, it thereby became a party to the evil. A number of ministers entertained the same idea, among the most ardent and aggressive of whom was the former pastor of the Springfield congregation, Rev. Adrian Aten. After leaving Springfield, Aten had been installed as pastor of the congregation at Red Oak, which was within the jurisdiction of the Presbytery of Chillicothe. When this body met in April, 1845, he voted in favor of a motion to indefinitely postpone the appointment of commissioners to the General Assembly. The motion was lost, and a protest against the action of the Presbytery was presented by Mr. Aten and Rev. John Shepherd, on the ground that each General Assembly had forf...
