Colonel Sorrel corrects me for saying sir D. Baird retreated to Villa Franca without orders; and that stores were destroyed at Astorga. I admit the first to be an error. Nevertheless, a retrograde movement without orders from sir J. Moore was commenced. Craufurds brigade had passed Astorga before the retreat was countermanded; and I can assure colonel Sorrel, I did myself walk ankle-deep in spirits poured into the streets. 4. It is hinted I should not have censured sir D. Baird for sending an important despatch by a private dragoon, who got drunk and lost it. It is doubtful also, colonel Sorrel complains, whether the expression, blameable irregularity is applied to the inattention of the general, or the drunkenness of the dragoon. He intimates also that to say sir J. Moore personally directed the movements of sir D. Bairds division in the battle, is derogatory of the latters reputation. I cannot admit this. A general-in-chief must be somewhere; where he is he must direct. But touching the matter of the dragoon, I imputed blameable irregularity to the general; and justify it by the following statement of sir J. Moores aide-de-camp who carried the despatch. On the night that the rear of the army passed through Villa Franca, and halted at a small village about two leagues and a half from that town, sir J. Moore sent captain George Napier, one of his aides-de-camp, about two oclock in the morning, with despatches for sir D. Baird, enclosing orders to lieutenant-generals Hope and Fraser, the
