Nothing similar to the latter part of this proposition is to be found in the letter which was actually sent. f Rushworth, v. 565. and it became desirable to substitute methods which should, ostensibly at least, be legal. The Commons at Oxford did not, however, venture to impose a general tax. They substituted a contribution, to be levied on the wealthy, according to their means; and sent round letters, signed by the Speakers of the two Houses at Oxford. By these means, nearly 100,000/. was soon raised in money and plate; and some of the crown lands were pledged for the repayment. They also availed themselves of a tax, imposed in January, by an ordinance of the two Houses at Westminster, on wine, beer, and many articles of food. This was the first tax of this kind ever imposed by Parliament, and was the origin of our excise. This was thought, by the members at Oxford, a good expedient to be followed by the King; and thereupon it was settled, and to be governed and regulated by commissioners, in the same method it was done at London. A liberal supply was thus raised; the Kings commissioners declaring, as did those of the Parliament, that this unpopular tax, levied only under the pressure of necessity, should be continued no longer than to the end of the war, and then laid down and utterly abolished; which, adds Clarendon, few wise men believed it would ever be. t The Scotch invasion had compelled the King to direct Lord Ormond to conclude with the Irish rebels a cessation of arms for one year.
