Not illustrated. 1878 Excerpt: ... CHAPTER XXV. CHARLES I. AND CROMWELL. CAPTIVITY, TRIAL, AND DEATH OF THE KING. WHILE the Presbyterians were discussing and voting, Cromwell and his friends were acting. On the 4th of June, news arrived in London that on the preceding, day the king had been taken away from Holmby by a detachment of seven hundred men, and that the army held him in its power. It was a cornet named Joyce, of the regiment of the guards of Fairfax, who had performed the feat. Arriving secretly with his detachment of cavalry, he at first introduced himself alone into the castle, then he returned at midnight with his soldiers, demanding to speak with the king. Colonel Greaves and the commissioners of Parliament residing with his Majesty refused; they desired to close the iron portcullises, but the new comers dismounted and chatted with the garrison. Colonel Greavess men declared that they would not be separated from the rest of the army. At midday Joyce was master of the castle. He retired after having stationed sentinels in various parts. In the evening he caused the king to be awakened in order to speak to him. I will go with you, Mr. Joyce, said Charles, after a rather long conference, if your soldiers confirm what you have promised. On the morrow, at six oclock in the morning, Joyces troopers were grouped in battle-array in the courtyard; Mr. Joyce, said the king, appearing upon the steps, by what authority do you intend to take me from here? Sire, by the authority of the army, to prevent the designs of its enemies, who would once more plunge the kingdom in blood. That is not a legal authority. I know no other in England but mine, and after mine that of
