He come up and said, Speak to your young mistress. And I said, Where she at? He said, Right there, and pointed to the baby in my mistress arms. Lu Mayberry My oldest sister . . . was fooling with the clock and broke it, and my old marster taken her and tied a rope around her neck just enough to keep it from choking her and tied her up in the backyard and whipped her I dont know how long. There stood Mother, there stood Father, and there stood all the children, and none could come to her rescue. Mr. Reed In 1929, the Social Sciences Department at Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee, began recording the oral histories of former slaves. During the mid-1930s, the Federal Writers Project undertook a similar effort, ultimately compiling more than two thousand interviews and ten thousand pages of material in seventeen states. In this volume, thirty-six former slaves living in Tennessee recount what it was like to live under the yoke. Tennessee was not a large slaveholding state compared with others in the South. On the other hand, it was a leader in the abolition movement prior to 1830 and a powder keg of mixed Union and Confederate sympathies at the time of the Civil War. The voices in this volume thus recall the extreme conditions of slavery in the border country.
