

Genesis and Semitic Tradition (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Genesis and Semitic Tradition
Babylonian traditions concerning primitive times were cited by Greek and Jewish writers. These reports indicated that the peoples of Semitic race or Babylonian culture who dwelt on the Tigris and Euphrates rivers had accounts of the early ages which told the same story as the Hebrew narratives or showed common conceptions with them. But the genuineness, at times, and the antiquity of these reputed Babylonian traditions were questioned, and the doubts connected with them seriously detracted from their value for purposes of criticism. Investigation received new impetus and encouragement from that notable series of brilliant discoveries which were begun, it may be said without invidious comparison, by George Smith. Documents of great age, written in cuneiform characters, were unearthed which both confirmed the general trustworthiness of the Greek citations which have been mentioned, and demonstrated that much, perhaps all, of the doctrine taught in Israel concerning primitive times was an inheritance from Babylonia. These native records have illuminated and elucidated the early chapters of Genesis. They have established the antiquity of the Hebrew narratives as traditions, with all that this fact involves for interpretation, and they have contributed particulars of greater or less value, which were wanting in the Hebrew record, but which serve to at least cast a side light and sometimes to make methods and conceptions plain which before were obscure or ambiguous.
