

Breast Cancer Screening in Europe (ESO Monographs)

As controlled trials have demonstrated that in many European countries breast cancer mortality may be reduced by population-based mammographic screening of women over the age of 50, there is mounting pressure to introduce new service screening programmes. How should these programmes be planned and monitored? Is it cost-effective? We invited experts who work with the principal screening programmes in Europe to answer these questions and to describe their experiences. Particular attention has been given to planning, organisation and monitoring new screening programmes in order to achieve optimal results.
