

The Great News (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Great News During the year preceding the war, the author was employed by the United States government to find out how big business stood to the state in the principal European countries. He carried credentials from the President, addressed to the diplomatic service, which gave him access to the best sources of information. The deepest impression made upon his mind by this experience was a sense of the moral absurdity of the American business system in its ambiguous relation to the public power.
