

Moral Law and Civil Law: Parts of the Same Thing (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Moral Law and Civil Law: Parts of the Same Thing About twenty years ago, in an important trial in the city of Indianapolis, it was sought to break down the very strong testimony of a witness by showing that the general moral character of the witness was bad. It was not an attack upon the general reputation of the witness for truthfulness and veracity, but the inquiry was directed to the general moral character of the witness. About the same time, in another case in the same court, upon the application of a man to be admitted to the bar, a question was raised upon his moral character. A few weeks later, in another case, in another court, in the same courthouse, upon an application of a man for a license to sell intoxicating liquors, an issue was made upon his moral character.
