Excerpt from The Intellectuals and the Wage Workers: A Study in Educational Psychoanalysis One after another artists, educators, and scientists are springing up who are brave enough to assert that they have suggestions to make both to these economic subdivisions and to the great states which enclose them and seek to arbitrate their differences. Therefore it is fitting that such artists, lovers of art, scientists, and teachers, those who aspire to bring the various crafts and professions closer to science and the fine arts - for the sake of art and science quite as much as for the sake of the crafts and professions - should unite even as these industrial groups have united, or, better yet, should fuse themselves in union with the various appropriate industrial groups to form associations not for personal aggrandizement but for a richer and more spontaneous and more rational personal expression.
