

The National Liberal Federation: From Its Commencement to the General Election of 1906 (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The National Liberal Federation: From Its Commencement to the General Election of 1906

When first I became personally acquainted with the operations of the National Liberal Federation, the Author of this short history was at once its inspiration and its directing mind. Anyone less like the boss of an electoral Machine than Dr Spence Watson it would be impossible to imagine. Although a strong party man, his devotion to the Party was simply the measure of his conviction that no better instrument for the good service of the country and of the whole human race lay nearer to the hands of Englishmen at this period of our political development. Impatient though Dr Spence Watson may occasionally have been of plans and policies which, in his opinion, by distracting the attention and dividing the allegiance of individual electors, endangered the solidity and consequently the force of the Party Vote - nobody could be ten minutes in his company without making the discovery that the President of the National Liberal Federation was himself a man who not only would have scorned to owe allegiance to, but would have been the very first to head a revolt from, a Party which did not continue to embody those principles of civil and religious liberty all the world over which were, and happily still are, to him truths of perpetual and universal obligation.
